Do You Like Your Dentist?

In this world there are plenty of vocations : non secular, musical, works of charity and then Dentistry. I realized this only after observing the dentist's office with whom we share a floor.

They give a lot to the world and get nothing back. A week ago I asked a few acquaintances and family which executives they hate most. Almost collectively, counsels came first followed closely by teachers (owing to having a big number of teenagers as respondents) and then dentists (age was irrelevant here).

Mull it over, the rest of us standard people (except doctors) have to work hard thru college but if we are smart and fortunate we get our enormous break and the rest of life happens to us. Dentists on the other hand have the raw side of the deal. Like other doctors they're going thru years on years of study and no social life when in pre-med college. Then a few years of dentistry college (in the meantime the remainder of us are on to our second or 3rd roles) in order to get their operating licenses. Dentists nonetheless , unlike their contemporaries in other medical fields are normally not known as 'Dr. So and so' and regardless of whether they are they're not admired as much, nor glorified. I wonder if there is anyone that has ever heard a mother telling a kid, "One day I need you to become a...Dentist. "

Their clients are the worst in the world. Have you ever walked into a doctor's room smiling? If you are below the age of 14, you most likely enter reluctantly, wailing your lungs out and after hours of convincing (or as my elders did) one or two oppressive warnings you sit on the previously mentioned 'robot' chair and shut your mouth solid! It would then take several minutes of convincing and bribery by the dentist to get you to open up once again.

The other part of a dentist's consumers are the ever grouching folks, whose mouths' smell like they hadn't seen a brush since their service days in the Korean War. They keep misplacing their dentures or keep omitting to use floss. The worst , however , is still to come as the eccentrics in this class carry their fallen enamel in their purses expecting it to be stuck back onto their gums as though it were a broken melanin cup.

It seems also that dentists' clients have a lot of stuff in common : they do not grin (for obvious reasons) and if they do it's to check if they were given their money's worth ; they are in pain (hence sad) and they are always whinging. Yes. We complain more to our dentists than any one else, even our brokers in such difficult times! If it is's not about how unpleasant your teeth are at night, it about how you keep forgetting not to utilise a tooth pick!

Well you could be reading this and say, "Well at least they are well paid! " not really. Most dentists, if the rest are anything like mine, spend a little more time calling up insurance companies for approvals and checks than actually earning.

The worst part about our whining and fussing is that we do it to ourselves yet we keep going with our bad smoking, drinking, puking, tooth picking, sweets-eating, under / over brushing habits. After all this, dentists all around the world, just like sponges, keep absorbing the negative attitude and as we are his / her livelihood keep doing their roles. Sainly!

Next time you visit your dentist, you won't afford a smile or the price of your daughter's braces, but just keep your mouth shut, will you? There are many good Milwaukee dentists that really merit more respect. A similar thing goes for Memphis dentists and Boston dentists.
